A CARREUL DIFF. -- The health dopends largely upon the diet. Good food is in many instances better than medi-cine. How many dishes in common use ought to be discarded from our tables, if and she will do much toward repairing the wasted energies, if the kind of foos is given that the case demands. There the manner of preparing them, which we should always observe when cooking for an invalid guest, or member of the famfly. The fruits and vegetables should also be selected with great care, and often it is necessary that some special dish should be prepared for them, as they are necessarily deprived of so much that others indulge in. We feel more than repaid for extra work when we than repaid for extra work when we have succeeded in getting something to Park, a couple of years ago, and refused to tempt the appetate of the sick, with no
